It's been two weeks since international artist Rihanna posted her now infamous Tweet about why the world wasn't talking about the farmers protesting in India. Backlash would be a gross understatement to what she received. Hundreds and thousands berated the singer's actions and audacity to speak about 'foreign matters'. Personal slander such as her past abusive relationship with Chris Brown and casual slut shaming are common themes amongst the replies and retweets. Here are some of the top replies to her Tweet based on favorites and user clout/follower count.

"U tried to Malign d Image of Our Country , India. But Our govt,under PM @narendramodi dispatched #CoronaVaccine to ur Motherland, Barbados. This is Humanity. Think the gesture shown by us despite ur reckless behavior"

FOLLOWERS

"He! You rehana,Foreign breeds commenting on the affairs of India,Why do you get scared over the rape of Uygar Muslims in China, ever raised a voice? Dragan is danzer 🤔🤔🤔🤔"

"could you believe this?... For this one paid tweet @rihanna got 18 crore indian rs equal to 1.5 million US dollars... that even paid by Terrorist organisation PR company..its on indian agencies radar. 🤔"

Just from this sample set, we see that extremely polarised Tweets tend to get the most attention because of the scandalous nature and clickbait-y titles. This is how hate and misinformation spread like an uncontrollable wildfire. But what if we saw the story in its entirety?

It is unfortunate that many influential people from actors, politicians and sport stars were b(r)ought into Rihanna's hate train, but they are the loudest voices in a minority. Data shows us to appreciate the unheard, the loving and the grateful for Rihanna, an icon with such prominence to shed light to a pressing issue. Her innocuous Tweet sparked debate, conversation and even an ad slot in the Superbowl. The protests finally gained the momentum it deserved. These were some of the most popular keywords and themes against their sentiment score.
